LERA is a unique professional association that brings together leading academics, unionists and worker advocates, public and private sector managers, and neutrals interested in all aspects of labor and employment relations.

The over 90 sessions will include bargaining for anti-bullying language, managing sustainable labor-management relationships, new tools for negotiators, developing union power through community campaigns, speeches by AFL-CIO leaders Tefere Gebre and Sean McGarvey, and many other stimulating events. There will also be a planning meeting to launch a local LERA chapter that would host speakers or workshops several times a year for labor relations professionals from all sides of the table. There are also two pre-conference workshops on addressing tensions in the workplace and on internal union organizing. Attendees can register for one day or the entire conference. Early bird registration ends March 25.
